Apollo - Winemaking Innovation from OVinti

The latest trend in winemaking is the Egg shaped tank. Winemakers report superior fermentation results in these tanks due to the shape promoting both internal convection mixing and cap concentration.

OVinti introduces the first polyethylene "egg". We call it "Apollo" because it reminds us of the famous Apollo Space Capsule. The egg shape concentrates the cap during fermentation for deeper immersion and easier punchdown, and the mouth is easily sealed against fruit flies and oxygen, permitting sanitary conditions for extended maceration. The design is easy to clean and sterilize. Pivot supports allow rotation on the axis of the tank's center of gravity to facilitate dumping pomace into the press with a forklift.

Why Should You Take a Look At Apollo?

Versatility and Costs: Apollo and polyethylene, the medium of choice, for both small lot production of ultra premium wines and experimentation with fermentation parameters.

Maneuverability: Forklift or other lifting apparatus using two bolt-on pivots. A full tank is easily rocked back and forth to re-suspend lees, for example.

Easy To Handle: Apollo is easily manipulated by hand and can be quite stable at intermediate positions. The lifting apparatus can range from the sophisticated to a simple sling suspended from a forklift.

Once fermentation is complete Apollo serves as a long term storage (similar oxygen permeability to a neutral barrel) or general purpose tank for the winery. Replace those bin fermentors with Apollo and enjoy better fermentation conditions and year round use.
